TELEVISION NEEDS A CONSCIENCE
We hear a good deal about invasion of privacy these days. Some people deeply resent the questionnaires we're frequently asked to fill out by some knocker at the doors, even the census. They argue that information about their make of car, the number of bathrooms, and whether or not they smoke, is their own business.

One can make a case for parting with this information on the grounds that the information has economic and statistical value that is useful. Also, save for the census, we're not obliged to answer. We can refuse.

There is another aspect of this invasion of privacy that seems to go un-noticed, the beaming into homes of television programs unsuitable for children but shown in prime times. Householders should have the right to choose what enters their doors. Not long ago, in some parts of Canada the Confessions of the Boston Strangler was televised at eight o'clock on a Saturday night -- just the time many parents are turning their children over to sitters. It was preceded by the pious sentence "This is not recommended for children under 16," when possibly half or more of their viewers were children.

It is all very well to say that anyone can turn the set off; children won't, and parents can't monitor everything they see.

If an adult, or category X film is shown late at night, well and good. If it is running at a local cinema, clearly marked and children see it, the onus is on the family. Beaming such a film in at eight o'clock on a weekend is another matter.

If we have codes to monitor untruthful advertising, surely we should have a rule that films of violence unsuitable for children should not be thrust upon them in the place where they should be safe -- their own homes.

AN IMPOSSIBLE BURDEN

The publicly guaranteed debt of the poorer nations of the world have risen above $80 billion. This is the frightening figure the president of the World Bank, Robert McNamara, mentioned during a plea for more aid in a recent Toronto speech. Some of the poorest countries owe the wealthier nations so much money these days, a dangerously large proportion of their earnings from exports goes toward servicing this huge debt.

Some governments keep borrowing more and more in an effort to keep up with their payments. They are like the low-income worker who buys his house, his car, all his furniture and electrical equipment on easy-payment terms -- and who suddenly finds he can't really afford to put decent food into his huge refrigerator or gasoline into his brand-new automobile.

The affluent nations have assisted poorer countries by allowing them to reschedule their debts in certain instances. But clearly this is not the answer. Any realistic solution must be based, first of all, on recognition by well-to-do societies that the developing countries are shackled with an impossible burden.

One solution is to allow them better access to global markets, and not to bar their exports through a variety of protectionist devices. Critics of development assistance point to unemployment in the affluent societies. Why give aid, why give easier access to, say, North American markets when unemployment among workers is so high?

This is an empty argument. First of all, two wrongs don't make a right. Secondly, the affluent world will never solve its own problems by ignoring the far more acute misery of hundreds of millions of impoverished people in Asia, Africa and Latin America. How can the rich minority continue living in dignity when it chooses to minimize the hunger of the vast majority who must subsist on average per capita incomes of as little as one or two dollars per week?

The state of degradation that still has countless millions in its grips is a challenge to humanity. It is, in fact, the greatest single task facing the world. And the rich world's posture must not be self-seeking rationalizations for inaction, but generosity, cooperation and -- perhaps most important of all -- genuine understanding toward the less favoured.

Wise, Unwise And Otherwise

by the Old Owl
FREEDOM

To the thousands of black slaves in the Southern States (and in Canada) this word represented an impossible dream. Today in Vietnam there are, apparently, thousands of political prisoners who have had their freedom taken from them. In various parts of Africa, in Greece, Spain and other parts of the world freedom has either been abolished in part or considerably curtailed.

What about us? From the legal or political standpoint we have complete freedom. In Canada no one can be imprisoned for the expression of ideas, or sentiments no matter how far out they may be. The men who were imprisoned in Quebec a few years ago (the FLQ) were convicted, not of any political views they might hold, but for kidnapping and murder. We may well be thankful that the British ideal of freedom and liberty was brought to this land by the British settlers and gladly welcomed by the French in Quebec, and others from other lands who came here as political refugees and did their part to help create the democracy of Canada.

However, the love of freedom may become too extreme and licence may develop in any country that sets a high value on freedom. The right of citizens to demonstrate for or against a government or for some other reason is part of our heritage of freedom, but I think our Canadian students went too far, especially as they were demonstrating against something in which Canada was not involved. Then there is a totally different abuse of freedom in Canada by the theatrical world. Of course, I have not seen any of these pictures or "live" performances but the advertisements in the paper are either false or they give an example of liberty gone to seed.

In the use of our highways (and the by-ways) we have another example of liberty being made an excuse for licence. There are people who seem to think that they have the liberty to misuse the roadway by travelling in such a manner, or at such a speed, that they endanger the other users of the Highway -- in fact sometimes they kill them.

Freedom we have and it must be cherished and protected, but we do not protect freedom by turning it into a licence. We must all recognize this. Freedom is a tender plant and we must be willing to accept certain restrictions and curtailments in order to preserve the freedom we have now. There are hundreds of thousands of people all over the world who do not have the freedom we have. Let us protect that freedom from any who would destroy it -- be he a government, a theatrical producer, an auto manufacturer or any other.

MORNING

With sun's glowing ray of rising,
Smiling at another day.
Thrilling mind in realizing,
A glowing future in smiling ray.

Urged by fresh clean morning,
To start this living day anew.
Like sun's ray so glowing,
Seeing life measured true.

In appreciation for this morning,
Knowing all this is given free,
My heart is filled to overflowing,
Realizing it includes, even me.
