Shots For Flu

by the H - N TB - RD Association. Influenza can be devastating for people who already have long-term diseases. Especially chronic heart or lung diseases.

There is no agreement about recommending flu vaccination for healthy people. But authorities do agree that older people in general and people with chronic heart or lung disease should receive flu shots and annual boosters. The Public Health Service also recommends the shots for people who have severe diabetes and chronic kidney disease.

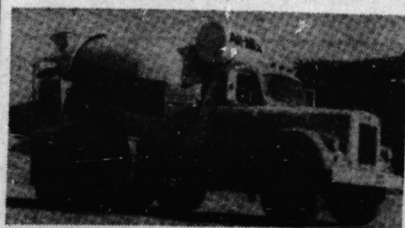

Unfortunately, many patients who need flu shots and boosters do not get them. Yet many of these people have direct contact with medical institutions, chest clinics and emphysema clubs. This year, lung associations across the country are cooperating with public health departments to be sure that people who need flu shots get them.

The flu, which is caused by different types of influenza viruses, can take a considerable toll on a healthy person. People with chronic illness have an even harder time. From 18 to 36 hours after the virus is inhaled, the infected person usually becomes acutely ill with fever. The fever may last several days and leave the person exhausted. The flu infection can pave the way for pneumonia, which can be fatal.

The onset of flu is sudden. Chills, headache, and muscular aches are common. The heart and lungs work overtime and a doctor's care at home or in a hospital may be needed if the breathing or pulse is adversely affected, the fever is high and persistent, or other complications occur. Unfortunately, there is no specific treatment for flu once it develops. But rest, warmth, and aspirin can help relieve distress.
