

Water in Canada topic of year book

Canada uses 1400 gallons of water every day for each man, woman and child in this country.

The 1975 Year Book, compiled by the Inland Waters Directorate of Environment Canada, will serve as a comprehensive introduction to water in Canada. In subsequent years, the publication will be limited to in-depth treatment of specific water issues and updated statistical data.

This daily requirement of 1400 gallons covers much more than personal use, which amounts to about 50 gallons of water for each person in the average household. The remaining 1350 gallons per day are required for manufacturing, cooling, municipal services, agriculture, mining and other activities involved in maintaining our standard of living.

"Growth in all sectors of water use has brought conflicts," states the Year Book. "Resolution of these conflicts is a major aim of water management in Canada today."

The Year Book reviews Canada's climate, discusses surface and subsurface water resources and describes seven of our larger river systems.

It lists agencies active in water resource management, and the main legislation through which federal and provincial governments deal with water. And it examines problems of deteriorating water quality and programs undertaken to cope with them.

Government programs water resource management are outlined, along with what's involved in river basin planning and management. And current trends in Canadian water research are discussed.

The Canada Water Year Book 1975 is on sale at all Information Canada bookstores at $4.95 in Canada, $5.95 elsewhere.
